

Use of Your Own Previously Published Material

Copyright Approvals

- If you have previously published materials (e.g., excerpts or complete journal articles written by you or with other authors) which you would like to include in your thesis or dissertation, copyright approvals must be obtained and placed in the appendix.

Departmental Decision

- Departments, not the Graduate College, shall decide whether students may include their own previously published, in press, multi-authored materials, and how many they may include, in their document. This is a matter of departmental discretion, decided in accordance with each department's relevant procedures.

Formatting

- A thesis or dissertation may NOT consist solely of previously published materials or journal articles formatted as published. Theses and dissertations must meet the formatting requirements as set forth in the guidelines found on the Thesis & Dissertation Guidelines page, as well as conform to the style guide of the department/discipline. If your thesis or dissertation consists of multiple articles, the first chapter must tie the articles together under a common theme or topic. Each article/chapter must begin with a chapter abstract summarizing that article/chapter. Following the abstract, a statement must be included indicating your contribution to the article/chapter (e.g., sole author, first author, second author, etc.). Each article/chapter must include the names of all contributing authors, if applicable.

IRB Approval

- If you had any Institutional Review Board (IRB) approvals connected to your previously published materials, these must be included in an appendix.

Publisher Requirements

- Your publisher could put more exacting requirements on how you present information in your final dissertation or thesis document than what is laid out in the Graduate College Guidelines. If you are using previously published articles in your thesis or dissertation, it is your responsibility to contact the publisher before defending your document and get a copy of these requirements. These requirements must be present in your document prior to defending. Changes required by publishers that are not approved at the time of defense will not be considered by the Graduate College without a formal appeal (all Graduate College Forms can be seen here – the appeal form will be found in Grad Rebel Gateway).

Embargo

- Some publishers will restrict the release of previously published materials to ProQuest, but will allow for items to be made available through the university. If this is the case, you will need to submit an embargo form along with a statement from the publisher or a copy of your publication agreement that expressly prohibits you from publishing in ProQuest. If your embargo request is approved, you will only be required to upload your document to Oasis: UNLV's Repository for Scholarship, Research, and Creative Activity. Due to the longer processing time associated with this embargo, it must be turned in two weeks prior to the ProQuest upload deadline.
