

Acceptable and Unacceptable Interview Questions

The guiding principle behind any question to an applicant—whether the question is asked by the interviewer or appears on the employment application—should be, "Can the employer demonstrate a job-related necessity for asking the question?" The intent behind the question, as well as how the information is used, is what the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) examines to determine if any discrimination has occurred.

Therefore, an applicant should be asked questions that are job-related only. Before asking the question, the interviewer should first determine whether this information is really necessary to judge the applicant's qualifications, level of skills and overall competence for the job in question.

*Note on arrest records: Using arrest or conviction records as an absolute bar to employment disproportionately excludes certain racial groups. Therefore, such records should not be used in this manner unless there is a business need for their use. Thus, an exclusion based on an arrest record is justified only if the conduct is job-related and relatively recent and also if the applicant or employee actually engaged in the conduct for which he or she was arrested. According to the EEOC, whether there is a business need to exclude persons with conviction records from particular jobs depends on the nature of the job, the nature and seriousness of the offense, and the length of time since the conviction or incarceration. In addition, some states bar the use of arrest records in employment decisions.

Human Resources will oversee the review and any needed action of criminal convictions disclosures submitted by candidates.

**Note on salary history: In general, salary history should not be a factor in setting compensation. Rather, compensation decisions should be based on the value of the position to the organization, competition in the market and other bona fide business factors.
