

Use of Previously Published Material

- Copyright approvals for previously published materials must be obtained and placed in the appendix.
- Departments, not the Graduate College, shall decide whether or not students may include their own previously published, in press, multi-authored materials (e.g. journal articles or excerpts), and how many they may include, in their document. This is a matter of departmental discretion, decided in accordance with each department's relevant procedures.
- A thesis/dissertation may NOT consist SOLELY of previously published materials or journal articles, formatted as published (photocopied and stapled together). Theses and dissertations must meet the formatting requirements as set forth in this guide and prepared for electronic submission; as well as conform to the respective departmental styles guides/sheets. In cases where multiple articles comprise the thesis/dissertation, the first chapter must tie the articles together under a common theme or topic. Each article/chapter must begin with a chapter abstract summarizing that article/chapter. Following the abstract, a statement must be included indicating the student's contribution in the article/chapter (sole author, first author, second author, etc.). Each article/chapter must include the names of all contributing authors, if any.
- If you had any Institutional Review Board (IRB) approvals connected to previously published materials, they must be included in your appendix.
- Your publisher could put more exacting requirements on how you present information in your final dissertation or thesis document than what is laid out in the Graduate College guidelines. If you are using previously published articles as part of your thesis or dissertation, it is your responsibility to contact your publisher before defending your document and get a copy of these requirements. These requirements must be present in your document before defending. Changes required by publishers that are not approved at the time of defense will not be considered by the Graduate College without an approved formal appeal.

- Some publishers will restrict the release of previously published materials to ProQuest but will allow for items to be made available through the university. If this is the case, you will need to submit an embargo form along with a statement from the publisher or a copy of your publication agreement that expressly prohibits you from publishing in ProQuest. If your embargo request is approved, you will only be required to upload your document to the UNLV digital archive. Due to the longer processing time associated with this embargo, it must be turned in two weeks prior to the ProQuest Upload Deadline.
